Sprint 1 Reflection Andrew Kim

During our Sprint 1, I worked on the portion of our project talking about the target audience in the project. At that point, because I only knew the idea of the project, it was difficult to actually think about what the target audience would be. Without any specific details on how it was supposed to look like or its main functions, I didn't really know what exactly we were going for. Even communicating with my group, I didn't really get a proper answer. With a vague idea of what I'm looking for, I thought of scenarios where the project might be worth using but couldn't think of any use cases that actually made any sense. It only ended up changing once I really thought about the benefits of a project like this. In this case, the benefit would be learning more vocabulary on a day to day basis. Knowing the benefits, I created problems that people might have but assuming that the issues were so severe that it would be as if they require this project. In this case, the problems would be as if they barely know English and could not expand their vocabulary through regular means. Through this I could think of people that would fit that criteria and I eventually figured out on certain people that would fit the target audience category. After going through the process of creating the pitch video and the slides, it really became clear to me who I would be thinking about when creating this project. Through the process it also gave me my own idea of what the project might look like. My group didn't really have anything to go off on so having at least my own idea allowed me to understand a little more about what my group wanted to make. Even though it might not matter because I'm still unsure if the project has been approved or not, the Sprint gave me some insight on the process of how certain programs or projects are created, specifically the problems and issues that they are created to resolve instead of just assuming that the people who made them made it for no reason.
