Sprint 4 Reflection Andrew Kim

For the fourth sprint, I contributed to making user stories based off of the meetings I had with the professor after our project idea was finally approved. I was also the one that organized the meetings and talked to the professor, sometimes by myself, because my group didn't have time or couldn't meet with him. Because of this I was basically the one who announced to the group that we didn't have a term long project. I think it was definitely not big in terms of contributions but it was extremely important. If I had never set the meeting and announced it to our group, we would not have had a valid project. If anything, the roadblocks for me was the realization that basically nothing we had done in the past 8 weeks mattered and we horribly missed the scope of how big the project was supposed to be. It really sent me into a panic and was extremely discouraging because we now had an entire 12 week long project due within the span of 4 weeks.

One of the biggest things I learned from this sprint is that approval from stakeholders or users is extremely important. I assumed a lot of things and in my head thought this would make sense but clearly without approval it doesn't really matter. My opinions and assumptions should not matter when the stakeholder or user is making the choices, unless I am the stakeholder or user. If I had known that a little sooner or asked a little sooner or scheduled more meetings in the earlier part of the project or tried to ask for more help earlier it would be much more improved but since we can't go back in time, we are stuck in a very difficult and probably impossible situation where the project itself is very unlikely to be finished.

It concerns me greatly that most likely we will not finish this project. Even with an extreme amount of extra help I don't think it's possible. I am extremely discouraged about what will become the end product because it won't be enough and I'll fail the class. At this point it feels like the best option would be to give up and retake the class next time.