Reflection Sprint 5

My primary responsibilities during this sprint were to assist the team with the sprint review video and the user stories. In order to ensure that the user stories were clear and in line with our sprint target, I helped organize and review them. In addition to making minor changes or recommendations when anything needed to be explained, I assisted in ensuring that every narrative had a distinct goal and conclusion. To make sure everything functioned as planned, I helped test a handful of the finished features, particularly those pertaining to word filtering, definitions, and flashcard practice.

I assisted the team in making the sprint review video as well. My primary responsibilities included gathering screen captures, creating portions of the screenplay, and assisting with the arrangement of the demo's content. I ensured that the film effectively showcased our team's accomplishments during the sprint and that the transitions were seamless. Despite not being in charge of the video editing process, I contributed to its final polish and ensured that every completed user story was accurately depicted.

Keeping track of modifications to the user stories throughout the sprint was one of the difficulties I faced. It was simple to forget about minor changes when features changed or evolved. In order to handle that, I increased my communication with teams who were carrying out the tales directly, which helped maintain consistency.

I learned the value of teamwork and structure from this sprint. I discovered how thorough user stories can direct development and how teamwork is facilitated by documentation. Additionally, working on the video improved my communication and presentation abilities.

I want to test more aggressively and give feedback early in the development process in the upcoming sprint. Overall, I believe I made a good helpful contribution and ensured that our sprint goals were well documented and communicated.
